methodical instruction in acquiring the English language. The development of language was assumed to occur by the mere exposure of children to a language-enriched environment. Therefore, systematic teaching of skills that are requisites for more advanced language skills was deemed to be unnecessary. But that is not necessarily true. Even today, many preschool special education programs for children with autism are predicated on the exposure theory of language development<sup>3</sup> and that is not enough for children with autism.

Children with autism in Lovdas' nationally recognized treatment program were initially taught to imitate upon command, both nonverbal and verbal behaviors. Nonverbal imitation involved doing something, such as clapping your hands and having the child repeat that action. Vocal imitation initially involved making single sounds or phonemes and shaping approximations to those sounds. From these initial starts, the child was taught to come closer and closer to the sound being modeled until it was able to match that sound. From these early matched vocalizations, the child was then taught to imitate several words and then develop the skill to match any word produced by the therapist. After these children were able to imitate behavior and vocalizations, they were taught words to identify objects, actions, relations, and possession. Children continued working on these language skills, resulting in some of them speaking in short sentences after a time frame of a year.

Why did this effort succeed in developing language where other efforts had failed? First, in contrast to the psychoanalytic view, Lovaas and colleagues conceptualized the child's problems as one of skill deficit, requiring direct intervention. Providing psychotherapy to the mother had proved useless in terms of benefit to the child. Second, the EIBT approach was to directly teach such skills by presenting frequent alternatives are available. At that time, the Food and Drug Administration had already been studying this issue for at least two years. When the Food and Drug Administration published the July 30, 1999 Federal Register notice announcing the reclassification of powdered latex gloves, the agency also rejected the petition to ban powdered latex gloves [19].

The Food and Drug Administration has provided guidance on the hazards of medical gloves and medical devices formed from Hevea brasiliensis natural-latex. For example, the Food and Drug Administration requires medical glove manufacturers to identify on the package labeling that natural-latex is used. Furthermore, the Food and Drug Administration requires that all medical devices containing natural-latex to be labeled as such and to carry a caution that natural-latex can cause allergic reactions.

In 2007, a citizen petition requested that the Commissioner issue a regulation for Hevea brasiliensis natural-latex, used in the manufacture of infant products, wherein said latex meets the minimum standards of protein content based on The American Society for Testing and Materials D1076-06 (Category 4) that defines latex containing less than 200 micrograms total protein per gram of dry weight of natural-latex.

94 Michael J. Dochniak and Denise H. Dunn

In a letter from the Food and Drug Administration dated July, 18, 2008, the Director - Office of Food Additive Safety - wrote,

"The purpose of this letter is to advise you, in accordance with 21 CFR 10.30(e), that we have not reached a decision within 180 days of the filing of the petition because of the limited availability of resources and other agency priorities."

Natural-latex allergy continues to be a serious health issue. In 2008, the Food
